Howdy Texas FFA, last fall I had a plan to do something for my community. I heard about our local rainbow room needing additional funding to better complete its purpose. In case you don't know the rainbow room is a place within CPS where children can get things they need. I decided to do a home run derby in order to raise funds. Sadly, after much planning I failed to make it happen. Some of my facilitators had schedule conflicts and there was going to be weather trouble. I had to cancel, but I still dream of building Dingers for Diapers into an annual event benefiting my local rainbow room. However, since I've exercised my ability of "yet" I've learned new skills that will help next time. Texas FFA you may not have knocked one out of the park, YET. You may not have won a speaking contest or livestock show, yet. I know I haven't. But it's not over. The power of YET is in your corner. Theodore Roosevelt once said that, "Credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena." But he didn't stop there. The next line he says, "the man whose face is marred by dust, and sweat, and blood, who strives valiantly." Credit belongs to us. Members of the Texas FFA who are in the arena making our communities better every day. Credit belongs to those of us who are learning to produce the world's food supply. The power of the word YET allows us to continue to strive and to earn that credit. As an organization, we haven't solved the World's problems.....YET. But with the power of YET we can continue to strive to make this world a better place.
